Station-Keeper Rodgers referred him to Captain O'Haver, who together with Detective Pryde, became re sponsible for the woman's fine, provided he would marry the woman as promised. Ac cordingly a marriage license was procured and the couple conducted before Esquire Quigley, who was asked to perform the cere-mony. The 'Squire, knowing the character of the woman so well, at first refused, supposing that the young man was not aware of the step he was taking. The young man insisted, declaring that he had been ac-quainted with the young woman the past nine or ten months, and that he loved her to the extent that he was not only willing, but anxious, to claim he as his wife. Squire Quigley still persisted in refusing to perform the ceremony, stating that he did not wish to be the instrument of making two lives as unhappy as he had reason to be-lieve such a union would result in. The neve such a union would result in. The young man then positively declared that if Squire Quigley did not unite them they would get someone else to do it. The Squire finally yielded, and the ceremony was duly performed, and the two manifested as much happiness of the unalloyed brand as is usual under more favorable circumstances. under more favorable circumstances.
